Artificial Irrigation of Land.

The Newburyport Herald truly remarks that before the farmers have passed through many seasons as the last two, they will begin to think generally of artificial irrigation. This is a matter, that, as yet, has received very little attention in New England, but it cannot be doubted that irrigating their land. It is well known of Utah blossom like the rose by a judi-

"Though without doubt artificial watering was first resorted to because of the failure of the natural supply, yet experience has proved that even in ordinary seasons, when there is sufficient rain for the absolute wants of vegetation, the application of water in large quantities acts as a stimulant, takes the place of more proving it in both quantity and quality. This is due to the salt and vegetable matter which the water holds in solution and suspension, and which is in the proper state for immediate assimulation to the tissues of the plants. As early as the days of Queen Elisabeth the agriculturists of England had learned the value of water as a manure, or rather, as it might be more correct to say, as the vehicle of manure, and extensive works were laid out and put large estates. For a long time the practhat if the value of grass could be doubled on a meadow naturally moist, by the addition of still more water, that on dry up- where. land it would tell with still better effect, and now the irrigation of all sorts of fields, even in the moist climate of England, has become very common, and is just becoming universal. As John Bull does not encousins, to learn of him in this matter.-We are spending fortunes in importing guano, and in the manufacture of artificial manures of all kinds, many of them worthless, while all our rivers, every day and hour and moment are silently bearing away to the ocean the rich salts, humus, animal waste of cities, and matters of all descriptions that might be turned into gold if some portion of the hurrying flood was detained, and diverted into channels suitably divided into mowing, tillage and pasture. through the farms and plantations of the 250 good sugar trees and probably one hundred country. But whether we value water as a fertilizer or not, it is becoming pretty evident of late years that we shall need it for its normal and legitimate use as a sustainer of the life of vegetation, if the causes now in operation continue, and the sooner a general interest is taken in the matter of furnishing our fields and pastures with a sure and unfailing supply of water, the better for our future prospects. The Cattle Plague.

The existing cattle plague among the cattle in England has provoked the query, among countless others of a speculative or scientific character, if it may not be due in a great measure to the forcing system | purchase money may remain for a term of years. adopted in modern agriculture that cattle are so much the more liable to disease and epidemic than formerly. The aim of breeders is, of course, to produce by skilful and persistent crossing a class of animals from which the best possible pecuniary returns may be secured in the shortest possible time. Common observation teaches that such cattle are not the same with those who lead natural and therefore healthy lives upon the hillsides and in the op en pasture. The work of pamperingwhether by choosing strains of blood with such care or selecting the food and establishing the habits with such tyranical nicety-cannot prove the most favorable in its results for the health which is expected to In the town of Westmore. AN IMPORTANT FACT FOR FARMERS.-Bells will prevent the depredations of dogs among your sheep. The reason is plain. A dog that knows enough to kill sheep also knows enough to be still and sly about it. The great noise produced by a number of bells makes him fear for his safety, and he leaves without doing damage. The bells also would bring the friends of the boundary with the above him fear or to live after the above him fear or to live had been after the above him fear or to live after the above him fear or to live had been after the above him fear for his safety.
